Lincoln's naval strategies were developed in close collaboration with the Secretary of the Navy, Gideon Welles. Together, they worked to create a formidable naval force that would be capable of carrying out the Union's war plans.

One of the most important decisions made by Lincoln and Welles was to establish a naval blockade of the Confederate coast. This blockade was designed to prevent the Confederacy from importing goods and exporting cotton, its main source of revenue.

The blockade was a major success, and it played a significant role in the Union's victory. It also helped to cripple the Confederate economy and make it difficult for the Confederacy to wage war.

In addition to the blockade, Lincoln and Welles also authorized the creation of the Union Navy's ironclad fleet. These ships were heavily armored and armed with powerful guns, making them virtually impervious to Confederate fire.

The ironclad fleet played a major role in the capture of New Orleans and Vicksburg, two of the most important Confederate cities. They also helped to protect Union shipping and disrupt Confederate commerce.

Lincoln's naval strategies were not without their challenges. The Confederacy developed a number of innovative naval technologies, such as the submarine and the torpedo, that threatened the Union's blockade.

However, Lincoln and Welles were always able to adapt their strategies to meet the changing circumstances of the war. Their unwavering determination and innovative leadership were essential to the Union's ultimate victory.
