

Cap Badges of the British Army 1939-45: A Collector's Guide to Insignia of the Second World War

The cap badge is a small insignia worn on the headdress of military personnel to identify their unit or regiment. Cap badges have been used by the British Army for centuries, and they have evolved over time to reflect the changing nature of warfare. During the Second World War, the British Army introduced a number of new cap badges to reflect the expansion of the army and the creation of new units. These cap badges are now highly sought-after by collectors, and they offer a fascinating glimpse into the history of the British Army during one of its most turbulent periods.

The earliest known cap badges in the British Army date back to the 16th century. These badges were typically made of metal, and they were worn on the front of the helmet or cap. The designs of these early badges were often simple, and they typically featured the unit's name or crest.

During the 17th and 18th centuries, cap badges became more elaborate. They were often made of gold or silver, and they featured intricate designs. The designs of these badges often reflected the unit's history and traditions.
