

Off School, In Court: A Shocking Exposé on the Criminalization of Students

In the United States, over 3 million students are arrested or referred to law enforcement each year. That's one student every 30 seconds. And the vast majority of these students are not being arrested for serious crimes. In fact, many of them are being arrested for minor offenses, such as disFree Downloadably conduct, truancy, and possession of marijuana.

This alarming trend is known as the "school-to-prison pipeline." It is a system in which students are pushed out of school and into the criminal justice system for behaviors that would once have been handled by school administrators. The school-to-prison pipeline has a devastating impact on students, their families, and their communities. It leads to increased dropout rates, higher rates of unemployment, and greater involvement in the criminal justice system.
