The Crime

On April 15, 1920, a group of masked men robbed a shoe factory in South Braintree, Massachusetts. The robbers shot and killed the paymaster, Frederick Parmenter, and a guard, Alessandro Berardelli. The crime shocked the community, and the police quickly launched a manhunt. Two days later, Sacco and Vanzetti were arrested. They were both Italian immigrants and anarchists, and they had been involved in labor protests in the past. The police believed that they had committed the robbery to raise money for their anarchist activities.

The Trial

The trial of Sacco and Vanzetti began in June 1921. The prosecution's case was based on circumstantial evidence, including the fact that Sacco and Vanzetti had been seen in the area of the robbery on the day of the crime. The defense presented alibi witnesses, but the jury was not convinced. On July 14, 1921, Sacco and Vanzetti were found guilty of murder and sentenced to death.

The Appeals

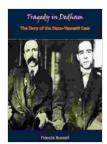

Sacco and Vanzetti appealed their convictions, but their appeals were denied. In 1925, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court upheld the convictions, and in 1927, the U.S. Supreme Court refused to review the case. On August 23, 1927, Sacco and Vanzetti were executed in the electric chair.

The Legacy

The Sacco and Vanzetti case is still considered one of the most controversial and unjust in American history. Many people believe that Sacco and Vanzetti were innocent, and that they were executed because of their political beliefs and their immigrant status. The case has been the subject of numerous books, articles, and films, and it continues to be studied by historians and legal scholars.

The Sacco and Vanzetti case is a tragic tale of injustice and discrimination. It is a reminder of the dangers of prejudice and bias, and of the importance of due process of law. The case also highlights the important role that the media can play in shaping public opinion. The Sacco and Vanzetti case is a reminder that we must always be vigilant in protecting our civil liberties, and that we must never allow ourselves to be swayed by prejudice or emotion.
